

Peter Sarson, Parent

"I have no problem with the common core methods. There is always resistance to change, but I find the instruction methods sound, and my children have picked them up nicely, thanks to the perseverance and open mindedness of their wonderful teachers.

However, I do wish there was more flexibility in the prescribed methods, to allow teachers to respond to the pace of their students (fast some days, slow other days; quick to pick up on some lessons; less on others). At present, teachers do not have enough room in their lesson plan to reinforce subject matter where necessary, because too much of everyday is taken up with required lesson. As a result, our children come home mentally exhausted, and struggle to find the mental energy to finish their homework. Thanks for reading!"
