The only way that Common Core has a chance of succeeding is for the state to completely reset the conversation. That reset begins this way: "The state of New York, the Board of Regents and the NYS Department of Education apologizes to parents and students for the myriad of mistakes we made in implementing Common Core. We are sorry that we patronized you and regret the arrogance and indifference we showed when you tried to be heard. We acknowledge now that our responsibility is to convince you of the merits of Common Core rather than simply decide to try to jam it down your throats. We are deeply sorry. Let's start over." PS: Good riddance John King and Meryl Tisch.
