

Noah Sachs, Student

"I am a student who is in the 11th grade also the year which the common core was thrown upon my fellow students and i. the curriculum itself is extremely difficult and the rules and ways of answering a certain type of multiple choice or student response question have completely changed. With the fact of all these rule changes and ways of completing a problem, the students who have been in school learning from K-11 are now spontaneously told and taught to think differently when examining a question/problem. Throughout our entire academic career we have been taught a certain way of doing things and to be told that you have to obey the new rules of the curriculum in a year with extreme crazyness is unbearable. As an 11th grader i find it extremely difficult to manage time itself now with the effect of new curriculum and ways of doing things i have no time to teach myself rules that the government representatives just randomly made up. If an answer to a question was 100% correct a year ago how is it not correct st all now. students have to go through this in there head everytime they take a test."
